

The No-Contact Reset

*Decluttering your space and untangling your finances
after a breakup*

Your ex's hoodie on the chair. The mug they always used. The shared streaming account that still shows their profile. Physical and financial reminders keep a relationship alive in your space long after it's ended. A reset is a practical way to reclaim your home and your money.

Should you throw away things from your ex?

You don't have to decide everything now. A simple approach is three boxes:

- Return: their belongings. Arrange a low-contact handover.
- Store: sentimental items you're not ready to decide on. Tape it up and put it out of sight for three months.
- Let go: things that only hurt to see. Donate, recycle or throw away.

A room-by-room reset

- Bedroom: new bedding if you can, move the furniture, clear the bedside table.
- Living room: change one visible thing, like art, a rug or cushions.
- Kitchen: clear the fridge of their favourites and the cupboard of their mugs.
- Phone and laptop: archive photos, rename shared playlists, clean up saved passwords.

Untangling finances

1. List every shared account, subscription, bill and loan.
2. Change passwords on anything they had access to.
3. Remove them from, or leave, shared subscriptions.
4. Settle who owes what in one calm, written message.
5. Update direct debits, emergency contacts and beneficiaries.
6. For joint loans, leases or property, get proper advice before you sign anything.

Build your own budget

If your costs have changed, take an hour to write a simple budget for your new life. It can be one of the most grounding things to do after a breakup, because it replaces a vague worry with a plan.

Make it a ritual

Some people find it helps to mark the reset: a clean-out weekend with a friend, a new plant, a meal cooked in the newly arranged kitchen. It turns a sad chore into a fresh start.
